

The No-Call list is a wonderful protection for consumers, and has greatly eliminated the number of nuisance phone calls we have received at our home, especially during the evening "family hours". The law needs to be strengthened to also preclude political parties from calling, and certainly should not be weakened in any way. The American public is inundated with marketing materials as it is, and banking institutions can already contact consumers who currently use their institution. The FCC should not weaken this law in any way.
